What if my reference doesn't match one of these examples?

If you need to cite a document that doesn't fit one of these examples, you can craft your own reference, keeping in mind the differences in punctuation and order that are required by bibliographic and note form.

To enable your reader to find the document, be sure that you include these basic facts:

- author, editor, or translator
- title
- version, volume number, or issue number
- number of pages
- date
- publisher's name and place

For an online document or expression, include these additional details:

- sponsoring organization
- date that you viewed the page or accessed the website
- the name of the service that makes the document possible (if the document is available only through a third party)
- URL
